CULTIVATING WISDOM™

SEPTEMBER CULTIVATING TIP

Gardening for a Rainy Day

Every Northern California farmer knows that rain can do a lot of damage to flowering cannabis plants. Despite ongoing drought conditions in California, we often get some early Fall rain, which can cause the dreaded botrytis, (also known as mold or bud rot,) and mean the total destruction of the entire crop. Our best recommendation is to erect rain cover, such as a semi-transparent plastic sheeting elevated at least a foot above your plants' canopy. Many cultivators use plastic piping to keep their tarp above the level of their kolas, and prevent moisture from coming into contact with their best buds. While this approach can be a little time-consuming and is definitely easier with the help of a trusted friend, it will be well worth it when harvest time comes! After all, this preventative measure is much less tedious than trying to solve the problem after it rains.
